"He drove the old car into a barn. He scoured the barn for work. Where can we sleep tonight? Well, there's Hooverville on the edge of the river. There's a whole raft of Hoovervilles on the edge of every town. The big ones are close to water, and the houses were tents, and sheet-ironed endboxes, paper houses, a great junk pile. The men drove his family in and became a class of Hoovervilles, always they were called Hooverville. The men and up his own tent as near to water as he could get. If he had no tent, he went to the city dump and brought back cartons and built a house of corrugated paper. And when the rains came the Hoovervilles and washed away. He sat in Hooverville and he scoured the countryside for work, and the little money he had went for gasoline to look for work."
